Soft Weapons with Charles Hugh Smith - April 17th

By Catherine Austin Fitts

Blogger and author Charles Hugh Smith of Of Two Minds will be joining me on the Solari Report this week. His work has long had a special appeal for me. No matter what the topic, Charles makes a serious effort to look into the heart of things while integrating a wide range of material – from global geopolitics and finance down to the intimate relationships between people and our money in a world gone mad.

Charles and I will start with a discussion of “soft weapons” – the tactics used to exercise targeted force through legal and financial means or through media and digital systems. Increasingly, invasive digital systems and complex economies create countless ways of waging war without dropping bombs, as described in his recent post on the Ukraine, How the Empire Might Strike Back. We will be talking about the Ukraine and other points of global tension as symptoms of the wider challenges of “peak everything” – more people, more competition for limited natural resources – and what you and I can do to navigate uncertain times.

Highlights from Last Week's Report

"Let's go back first to our preset position of a primary uptrend in gold and silver. I look for the primary uptrend; that is, the trend that will last 15-20 years and go either up or down. My premise is that the primary uptrend in gold began in 2001, and in silver in 2001, and it'll run 15-20 years. So a gold uptrend means that there must be a dollar downtrend, because it's the loss of value in the dollar that really drives a gold bull market and silver bull market."
