Introducing the Solari Food Series with Harry Blazer - June 02nd

To

"On 1/10 of an acre in Pasadena, the Dervaes family grows 6 to 7,000 lbs of vegetables, herbs, fruits, and berries each year, providing 90% of their produce at an estimated annual savings of $75,000." ~ urbanhomesteading.org

In the post-World War II era, power flowed from control of the reserve currency backed by oil. In the emerging multipolar world, as new technologies revolutionize our energy models, power increasingly flows from ownership and access to water, soil, and food.

This Thursday, I will be joined by Harry Blazer to launch our new series on food. Harry is my "go to" person on food. In my opinion, no one else knows more about the subject.

Harry founded "Harry's Farmers Market" in Atlanta in 1987, and grew it into the largest fresh food market in the country, before selling his business in 2001. In 2005, I moved to the Flathead Valley in western Montana at Harry's request, to work with him on creating a venture model to finance revitalizing local food production. While Harry taught me about food, I taught Harry about the real political and economic systems operating on planet Earth.

Harry has agreed to join me on the Solari Report to produce an exciting new series of food – to share with our subscribers his extraordinary understanding of the global food ecosystem and the role of food at the heart of nurturing human health and political and economic freedom.

In this introduction, Harry and I will provide an overview of the future of food and what it means to you – and what you can do about it. Harry will also give us a snapshot of some of the upcoming Solari Reports he will be hosting. We will post an in-depth audio introduction to Harry and a selection of related links, so make sure to login and check out the Subscriber Links.

Highlights from Last Week - Precious Metals Market Report with Franklin Sanders

This week on the Solari Report, Franklin Sanders of The Moneychanger joins me to take a look at precious metals markets.

Franklin and I will review the likelihood that the primary trend in gold and silver is returning. Franklin has more confidence in the outlook for 2016. I am concerned that the number of plausible and unpredictable scenarios are growing across all asset classes. So expect a lively discussion!

We will discuss signs around the globe that the build-out of the gold trading system continues, including the Chinese purchase of a London depository and the State of Texas moving forward with plans for a state depository available to citizens.

We will post Franklin's charts in the subscriber area in this post on Thursday. Please make sure you login to access them as you listen to the interview audio. They will be posted in the final transcript.

I will also invite Franklin's comments on what I learned on my trip to Australia.
