August 24, 2017

C. Austin Fitts: Ladies and gentlemen, it is a pleasure to welcome back to The Solari Report Scott Tips, who is the President of the National Health Federation. They publish Health Freedom News, which I'm a member.

Scott has joined us before to discuss Codex, and I was inspired by his latest update on Codex to have him return, but we have many, many things to talk about.

If you're not a member of the National Health Federation or a reader of Health Freedom News, it's one of the most useful publications I've ever received. I've been a member for quite a while, and I recommend it to you. At the end of the interview we'll get Scott to tell you how to sign up.

This is access to great people, great network, great information, and they are doing great things. You will be getting a very big bang for your buck when you support Scott and the NHF.

Scott, welcome, and thank you. You're in Europe, and I'm will be in Europe shortly. Thank you for taking the time to come in; I know how busy your schedule is.

Scott Tips: Thank you for having me on your program again. It's always a pleasure, and you always ask such interesting questions that continually seem to challenge. I like to be prepared.

C. Austin Fitts: One thing that I find amazing – because you are one of my heroes – is if you look at what you've done over many, many years to try to protect us from the phenomenon called Codex, I'll say to our mutual friends, "I don't know how he does it."

You've joined us for an interview on Codex before, but maybe you could discuss a little about what is Codex and what is the history of NHF really standing in the breach and protecting us from?

Scott Tips: Codex Alimentarius is the international body that really is formulating and constructing and issuing food standards guidelines that are then adopted by its various member states. At this point in time, this covers 99% of the world's population. What they have is any number of standards. It could be something as innocuous as how much cadmium will be allowed to be as a maximum permitted level in cacao, or it could be something more insidious where they set the upper maximum permitted limits for vitamins and minerals.

They have their fingers in many different pies, and the National Health Federation, the organization that I'm president of, has been fortunate enough to become accredited to Codex to attend the meetings and actively participate – and actually participate aggressively if you talk to any of them. In these meetings we try to eliminate or at least reduce the number of toxins and contaminants in our food at the same time that we make our foods or try to make our foods more nutritionally dense by increasing the levels of vitamins and minerals and other nutrients in the food and in the supplements that we can take.

That is essentially what we do at these meetings. We are constantly challenging the science because there is much fake science out there that is being used either by industry or by governments. Many times you can't tell the difference, but it's only bad junk science that is used to justify lowering the vitamin/mineral levels in our foods and increasing the toxins and contaminants that are allowed.

The reason Codex is important is because it governs international food trade. So once you get a standard adopted in Codex, then the entire world is the territory for these companies, and they can support that food to every other country, and that country cannot stop it. If it does try to stop it, then the 'offended' country can take that blocking country to an arbitration panel at the World Trade Organization and file a trade dispute and force the blocking country to accept the product, even if it's unhealthy for the population – or any population.

C. Austin Fitts: The Russians have come out very heavily against GMOs. So are the Russians a member of Codex?

Scott Tips: Yes, they are but they used to not be active. When I first started attending Codex meetings in the year 2000, but nonetheless, you wouldn't see a Russian around. But now they attend almost all the meetings the NHF goes to, and they have become quite vocal.

There was a language barrier at first because the Russians didn't speak English or French or Spanish that well; those were the three official languages of Codex. But now that they've expanded the official languages to include Arabic, Chinese, and Russian, they tend to be much more vocal.

Most of the time, they do argue against contaminants and toxins and the like. On the vitamin issue, they haven't been that good. For example, on this last Codex meeting – the nutrition committee meeting that took place in Hamburg in December 2016 – they did speak out in favor of higher levels of vitamin E, but they didn't push it. At Codex you have to be pushy to get your way or even have a chance at getting your way. You have to be, what I call, persistently vocal. Unfortunately, many of these bureaucrats – even the good ones – are not persistently vocal on the issues that count. So this has been a concern.

This is a good question to ask because the Russians are one of the few delegations there that are quite consistently but not completely pushing good nutrition for their population.

C. Austin Fitts: Who else is good?

Scott Tips: Believe it or not, Iran is very good. I probably won't earn any kudos from some of your listeners for saying that, but they speak out a lot of times in favor of good issues. In fact, it was somewhat unusual because I had spoken out on one issue – the vitamin E issue – at the commission meeting that we recently had in Geneva, Switzerland. I heavily criticized the entire commission for setting the vitamin E amount at 13.5 international units a day. I told them that it was a farce and that it was a stain on Codex and the like.

Two days later, when I was moving to the front to give my integrity speech to the commission, the Iranian delegates stopped me on the way and said, “I am offended that you said what you did two days ago.”

It was actually quite peculiar. I said to them, “Look, you are one of the few delegations here that really is interested in people's health, so it wasn't oriented towards you. However, you could have spoken up in favor of vitamin E.”

C. Austin Fitts: Besides the Russians and the Iranians, is there anyone else?

Scott Tips: India from time to time And South Africa used to be good, but no longer. We lost one of our best supporters with South Africa due to some controlled opposition group that took them out, unfortunately.

The European Union, believe it or not, is quite good on toxins and contaminant issues but they are lousy on vitamin issues. In fact, they threw us under the bus on vitamin D levels and vitamin E levels.

They didn't even support their own science; they caved like a cheap drunk on a Saturday night bench, and they went with the lowest possible value for vitamin D and vitamin E.

I don't have a lot of respect for them in those issues, but when it comes to protecting their population on contaminants, they are actually quite good.

C. Austin Fitts: You recently sent a new update, which is one of the inspirations for this conversation. Maybe you could walk us through that update and what has recently happened.

Scott Tips: That was called the Codex Alimentarius Commission. It's the parent body, of course, for Codex. Then there are various committees that are underneath it because the commission itself cannot do all of the work. But the commission does meet once a year, and they alternate. So they will meet in Geneva or in Rome – usually in July, and sometimes at the end of June.

This year it was the time to meet in Geneva, which is where the World Health Organization is headquartered. When they meet in Rome, it's at the Food and Agricultural Organization building. This year it was WHO's turn.

WHO/FAO provide most of the funding for the Codex Alimentarius commission, so they have this small arrangement. In any event, at the meeting that was held the third week of July, the issues arose of the vitamin D and vitamin E levels where the commission is expected to rubber stamp what the committee below them has done. In this case, the committee is the nutrition committee.

It came up, and we were hoping to stop it because they were setting vitamin D at 5 to 15 micrograms per day, which is roughly 200 to 600 international units per day. That is abysmally low. Even Canada sets the daily value at 1,000 units a day.

Then with vitamin E, they were refusing to recognize that it is a vitamin E complex, and that you need to look at four tocopherols and four tocotrienols. It's no longer what people thought it was in the 1950's and the 1960's – which was all about tocopherol. Science has moved on.

Unfortunately, Codex science has not caught up with the late 20th century, and it's still stuck in the mid-20th century. They think that alpha-tocopherol is where the game is played. Only looking at that, they once set the level at 9mg, which is only 13.5 international units.

Since I was 17 years old, I've been taking 400 international units a day – far above their 13.5. This is something that is quite disturbing, and which lead to my tongue-lashing of the commission when I had a chance to speak at the end of the very first day.

C. Austin Fitts: I daresay that if you'd been taking 13.5 a day during that time, there is no way that you would have had the physical strength to fight Codex.

Scott Tips: Maybe that is the fox-clever madness behind their strategy. Maybe they want us all to be so weak that we cannot resist them. (Actually, I think that is a large part of it, let alone the fertility part.)

They do not want us to be strong, and vitamin E has so clearly shown to be important for heart health. The longer you've been taking vitamin E, the lower your chance of getting a heart attack.

There was a recent study that was published that showed that the people who have been taking it for 20-30 years have lower heart attack risks than those who have recently started to take it.

C. Austin Fitts: Very interesting. That is the kind of thing I read and I love Health Freedom News when it comes.

Scott Tips: I'm glad.

C. Austin Fitts: I always stop and read it. You are the ones who actually motivated me to mega-dose and understand vitamin D, which has made a huge difference.

Scott Tips: I'm glad to hear it.

C. Austin Fitts: Although Jason Bawden-Smith always says, "I want you out in the sun more."

Scott Tips: There are some factors that you get from the sun that you won't get from the pill. Also, it's so nice to get out and not have plastic shoes or even leather shoes on, and ground yourself on the earth's magnetic energy, especially if you're usually working in a tall office building or the like.

I know that where you live you have the opportunity to go out and do just that.

C. Austin Fitts: I do it every day. I kick off my shoes and walk around and check in on the roses and the trees and everything.

Scott Tips: That is so smart.

It's a Codex meeting that we had, so we lost on the vitamin E and the vitamin E issue, but we still have the opportunity at the nutrition committee coming up in Berlin this December to try one of them again.

Quite honestly, I've forgotten which one is still up for consideration.

The way that it works is there is an 8-step process for these standards to be approved, and they go through the committee. At two of those stages, the commission looks in on the committee's work and says, "Yes, you're doing fine. We approve it for the next step."

One of them is at Step 5/7, and the other is at Step 8. So the Step 8 was approved, and there is no more discussion, but the Step 5 one there will be some discussion. I apologize; I mixed up which one is up. I'll have to look it up and see, but either vitamin D or vitamin E will be up for discussion at the nutrition committee in December.

C. Austin Fitts: This is why sovereign government money is so important – and the ability to issue sovereign bonds almost with impunity. When you set up very detailed complex processes like this, the people who have the money can wear everyone else down.

Scott Tips: Yes, that is a very good point. I think you may remember Thomas Sowell's quote, a free market economist, who said, "If you really want to understand bureaucracy, then you have to know that for bureaucrats procedure is everything and outcomes are nothing."

That is an exact description of Codex and their procedure. They follow procedure as though it is the 10 Commandments handed down from the mount. This is, for them, their bible. It doesn't matter if it's garbage in/garbage out. So long as they follow the procedure, they are perfectly fine with it.

C. Austin Fitts: If you study the people who are financing the process, they are very goal oriented.

Scott Tips: That is true.

C. Austin Fitts: One way that you get a small group of people to have an anti-human goal and having humans implement it is set up a complex process. Then the only person who gets financing is someone who adopts the attitude that you're describing; they are procedure oriented.

Over long periods of time, if you wear everybody down and keep financing and the people that are willing to take it in your direction, you can end up with some unbelievably efficiently implemented anti-human goals.

Scott Tips: That is very well put and I think that you are absolutely right on that. It certainly would describe Codex even better, I think.

C. Austin Fitts: That's why it's so remarkable that you people have been able to hang in there and fight them all the way.

Just bringing transparency to what is going on because you are in the room, and then challenging the fake science and challenging the fake news and constantly representing the human point of view is unbelievably invaluable.

Scott Tips: Thank you for that. It sure is a lonely thing and I eat many lunches at these Codex meetings by myself. I'm not winning any fan club votes or anything of that sort there.

C. Austin Fitts: Right. It's so much easier to do if no one is bringing up reality.

Scott Tips: That is very well put. If no one is bringing it up, then they can all play-act along with themselves. They have nice little meet-and-greet type of events and things like that, but it's so odd because some of these delegates, when I first started, were so anti-supplement –using that as an example – that when I would go to lunch and they would see me pull out my little plastic baggie of supplements to start taking, they would turn up their noses.

You know what is so exceptional? After a few years, they were taking the supplements themselves and they were asking for them. Some couldn't even get them in their country, so I would take supplements to the meetings and hand them out to take across the border because if you mailed them, the post office would block them. So it was from one extreme to another. They would be asking me for nutritional advice and the like and it was amazing.

The only problem is that this is my 18th year of going to Codex meetings, and many faces have changed. People I converted to our way of thinking – or at least more in that direction – are either gone now or they aren't at all the meetings. The Chilean delegate who so ardently spoke out at the nutrition committee at Hamburg last December in support of a much higher level of vitamin D was gone, and there was a different person attending. They didn't even know about the previous intervention by their colleague at the other committee. We tried to alert them to it, but it was too little, too late unfortunately, and they were silent on the issue.

The point is: You're looking at an ever-changing landscape of faces that come and go. As hard as we work to convince the delegates – and we've been quite successful in many cases – they retire or they leave or they get a job elsewhere, and we have to start over again.

C. Austin Fitts: Right. If they're for mega-dosing vitamin D, it's remarkable the speed at which jobs become available to hire them away.

I'll never forget, I was talking to a mayor of a town in California who had been voted out of office, and then miraculously received an offer to do her dream job from, none other, than Harvard in South America.

She had been opposing a big real estate project. I said to her, "Wait a minute. Was Harvard Endowment an investor?"

You could see that they clearly wanted to move her out of town. They are very good and very subtle. They always say to people, “I’m going to bless you because we’re going to do this,” and then they show up and buy you away. There have been more than a few people who have been bought away.

Scott Tips: I haven’t had any job offers yet. I guess they figure they can’t bribe me that way. But it is uncanny, the people you really don’t have to worry about – or the people you least have to worry about – are those who are very well grounded in principles of freedom. Those kinds of people are very tough to corrupt. It’s the ones who don’t have grounding in principles of freedom and morality who are really easy to corrupt or swing the wrong way.

I prefer to deal with people who actually know basic principles of freedom and interplay with other humans and similar. In any event, it’s interesting what you said about offering jobs and they move away from Codex or whatever it is that they are doing good things in.

C. Austin Fitts: Right. You always want to make it look subtle and that is what I found.

You have a new article in the recent Health Freedom News called ‘Supplements are safer than food, but bankers disagree.’

It’s true that Codex is moving against supplements, but we also see enormous fake news moving against supplements and all sorts of various efforts behind the scenes to squeeze the supplements business. Maybe you could review with us some of what you said. I thought it was fascinating.

Scott Tips: Thank you. In this particular article I was talking about the merchant accounts. We all know that having a merchant account is absolutely critical for online stores, and even for brick-and-mortar stores. So, usually before a store can even open its doors or a website, it has to first open a merchant account if it's going to accept a debit card or a credit card.

What we've observed through the years – what NHF and others have observed – is that with supplement companies, a large number of them are getting their accounts closed. The way it usually works is like this: They get a call, and are told that their legal department of whatever bank or merchant account provider they use, has reviewed their website and there are some questionable claims on the website that are not allowed by the merchant account agreement that they have with them. So they are having to shut them down and not allow them to accept cards anymore.

Or, if you're opening a new business, and then apply for a merchant account, the bank refuses it upfront because it's considered to be a 'dangerous and fraud-ridden business' that you are in.

It's absurd, but we have a supplement business that is ranked in the same category as these other businesses such as porn sites and '1-800' type of chat sites and risqué women's lingerie and all that sort of thing. We all know that, "Supplements are very much in that category."

What they're doing is back-dooring this attack, so to speak, on supplements and making them less available and making them more expensive to get. It's very dangerous because many dietary supplement businesses cannot afford to fight the merchant accounts on this.

Fortunately, the free market still prevails a bit in this area, so there are some merchant account providers who will provide services – almost no questions asked – to these online businesses, but it comes at a higher cost. So that cost is passed onto you and me in the form of what we have to pay for it.

C. Austin Fitts: What we've seen over the last two or three years is more and more examples of, when somebody is doing something that the anti-human team doesn't want, they will shut off their payment gateway, or we've seen a tremendous number of people get shut off by Facebook and Google in various ways, including the ads. It's one of the reasons I would never do business or anything with Google or Facebook.

It was interesting. After the election and after the change of the year, the independent media outlet told me that I was the only independent media person they knew who hadn't suffered a drop in revenues. That was because I never built that up, and I never built up the overhead associated with it.

Scott Tips: That is very interesting.

C. Austin Fitts: We're launching a new website, and we've been reviewing payment gateways, and it's the same problem. If you look at who their bank is, I keep saying, "Sorry, we're not going to use that."

Scott Tips: I should talk to you about which ones we should use for NHF because we want to avoid that same kind of vulnerability that you were indicating as a problem. It is something that business owners need to be careful of. I do food and drug law, and even some good clients of mine have had issues with merchant accounts like that, and they had been doing business with the bank for ten years or more in some cases. Yet the banks are suddenly – but not surprisingly – taking this hardline approach where they are actually acting as nongovernment regulatory agencies, and that is not their role. They should not be in that role.

C. Austin Fitts: Right. I always try to get all of our subscribers to watch the Aaron Russo interview with Infowars before he died. He talked about one of the Rockefellers telling him that they wanted everyone to have a chip and have digital currency so if you didn't behave; you could turn off their money.

If you look at all these different processes, that is exactly what they are building.

Scott Tips: It's a problem, and I think it will get worse over time. They will find other approaches. There are other ways to do it as well.

You may recall during the 1980's, before the internet, one approach was the bill introduced by Representative Claude Pepper of Florida, who was a Democratic Representative from South Florida, to actually prohibit the interstate shipment by the Post Office of vitamin and mineral supplements and dietary supplements.

C. Austin Fitts: I didn't know that.

Scott Tips: He introduced it and at the time, of course, the Democrats controlled both houses. He was the chairman of the committee, and he was a senior member of the House of Representatives. It was very likely going to pass.

Our then-president of the National Health Federation, Maureen Salaman, was trying her best to get in touch with Claude Pepper to convince him to withdraw the bill, but they kept having the blockers keep her from talking to him.

Finally she decided, “Well, a break is coming up,” and I forget which recess it was for the House. He was returning to his home district, so she found out from the secretary – and at that time this information was much more readily available than it is now – what flight he was on and what seat he was going to have (in First Class, of course). So she booked the First Class seat next to his, and rode from DC to Miami with him. She discussed and convinced him and, lo and behold, he withdrew the bill.

C. Austin Fitts: Wonderful!

Scott Tips: It never went through. It’s one of those unspoken victories NHF had that people don’t really know about. At the time, and certainly before the internet, that would have been a big deal to have blocked the Postal Service. That was before FedEx and UPS shipments became a big alternative. People would have been stopped from getting supplements through mail order.

That was a similar battle that was fought back then, and won it. It's not that we can't win now; of course we can, and we will. But it's a bit tougher now, and in some ways it's easier now. It depends upon the way you look at it. It is something that we have to keep fighting, and it's something where we need people to join us. I hate to say it with the handout, but we need donations because we don't get to these Codex meetings without financial support.

In fact, the committee meeting that we went to in April in China – the Pesticide Residue Committee – was the first time that we went to that committee meeting because we could never afford to go before, and that is the very committee meeting where, out of 220 or 230 delegates, we were the only ones to speak against glyphosate. We were the only ones and not even the European Union did that.

We made our case against it, both in writing and verbally, so we intend to keep going as long as the money holds out. We hadn't been able to go before because we simply didn't have the funds to cover all of the meetings, and yet Codex is important because this is the global game that covers the globe.

We can fight in Washington or Brussels or Mexico City or Paris or Ottawa, Canada or wherever it might be, but when the tire meets the road, the real game is played at the Codex level. That is where the global standards are being set.

C. Austin Fitts: Let's look at how the money works. If you study the average American family, they are paying $5,000 plus a year in Federal taxes to an organization that is basically reducing their health freedoms and taking them in a very anti- direction.

If you can afford to pay $5,000 to pay the US government to destroy you, the question is: Can you also afford to spend some money to the people who are trying to stop the US government from destroying you?

Scott Tips: You're right. You're so good at this kind of logic. I have to take my hat off to you because you're so good at that, and that is very well put.

C. Austin Fitts: Our challenge is that we are financing our own destruction now. I'll send you a copy of our 2nd Quarter Wrap Up when we publish the hard copy because it's about how to enforce the US Constitution. 'The rubber meets the road,' as you would say, where the money happens.

The biggest investment that most people in the country make is paying their Federal taxes. If that money is being spent with a negative return on investment to taxpayers, then we are financing our own destruction. The majority of that money, in my opinion, is being spent outside the Constitution and outside of the law.

I visited the Chief of Staff to the Appropriation Committee that oversees HUD and Treasury in 2001, and he said to me, "What do you think is going on at HUD?"

I was trying to be discreet because it was someone who I had never met before. So I said, “I don’t know. What do you think is going on at HUD?”

He said, “HUD is being run as a criminal enterprise.”

Well, HUD is run by a matrix structure of Department of Justice and the New York Fed Member banks and the Treasury, and the New York Fed Member banks to the Treasury. So if HUD is being run as a criminal enterprise, then the Federal government is being run as a criminal enterprise, which it is. So that is our financial challenge.

What you can’t do is give $5,000+ a year to a criminal enterprise to destroy your freedoms and then think that Scott Gibbs can stop it.

Scott Tips: Yes, with donuts and change in his pocket. It’s true.

C. Austin Fitts: Our financial equation is: How do we shift the money away from the criminal enterprise into the things that are protecting our freedoms? Ultimately, how do we insure that the US government is not a criminal enterprise?

Let me keep going because I learned that you were in Italy, and gave a speech on vaccines. Along with supplements, it is a very, very important health freedom issue. Could you update us on what you’re doing with vaccines?

Scott Tips: The problem arose in Italy, as it had in California, where they have four mandatory vaccines required for children –until late last month at least. There were four required for school children, but you could opt out with a small penalty. Even though it was not moral or good to do it that way, at least there was an option to forgo.

What happened was the Health Minister, Beatrice Lorenzin, declared an emergency and decided, “People aren’t getting vaccinated at the same rates as before, and we have a measles epidemic,” and the usual lies from the government, as they always seem to. So they created an emergency, and had a decree that was made, and then the Italian senate voted for it.

There were demonstrations that erupted throughout Italy from Rome to Genoa to the south, and Naples, and Venice, and Trieste. I went to the last rally, which was this past weekend, in Trieste. You may recall Trieste is the northern part of the Adriatic Sea. It was more recently attached to Italy.

In any event, I went and there was a crowd of about 2,000 people. It was a very well-organized rally and demonstration. In fact, no one has really been to a rally unless they’ve been to an Italian one because these are very angry people. There were mothers with their children and young kids and the like. I was one of several speakers, and I spoke for quite a period of time in English.

Unfortunately, my translator was not very good and mistranslated some things. She actually contradicted some of my English spoken words.

Fortunately some of the more vigilant Italian speakers jumped in and grabbed the microphone from her to correct it, but not all of what I said was corrected.

It was well received, and has already been posted online. Then I did a short two-minute interview with the demonstrators in the background for some media outlet. That has also been posted online on our Facebook page, the National Health Federation's Facebook page, and I think on our YouTube site as well. So anyone who is interested can go there and see the interview – both the long and short version – and the speech. The speech is being translated into Italian. There is going to be another event the beginning of September that I will probably go to as well.

The gist of it all is that now they want to require ten vaccines and a hefty penalty – all for school-age children whose immune systems are too immature to handle. Four was bad enough, but when you overwhelm an immature child's immune system with ten vaccines – most of which they don't, arguably, need. Some people would even argue that they don't need any of them. It becomes a travesty, and we see so many vaccine-injured children these days.

These people – the Health Minister and such – are chimpanzees with machine guns. They're out of control and don't have a reason to do it. It's purely money money, money and that is what they are doing.

C. Austin Fitts: Let me go back to where we started. I think what we're building up to globally is, at least 5% of the people globally, are the kind of people who are inclined to act or do realize how bad things are.

What I've said for many years I will say again: If you follow up the food chain through the bureaucrats to the corporations trying to make money, you reach a group of people who are clearly doing something very anti-human. They know exactly what they are doing, and it is intentional. Otherwise, the system would evolve in a healthier way.

This is not just about making money. We are looking at a force that has a strategic goal of debasing the human race. Some people describe that as depopulation and some describe it as making us much easier to control. You're talking about a series of restrictions on health freedom that is going to destroy our physical and intellectual capacity.

Scott Tips: That's right.

C. Austin Fitts: You were talking about a slow-moving destruction of the human race. When you essentially give half or more of the children autism that is where you're going.

Scott Tips: Absolutely. That's what we see as well. That's what we're fighting by doing this and I think we will win. We have many people behind us, and we are working with a lot of other groups and organizations. They are very determined, and they are doing very well.

C. Austin Fitts: The challenge that I've had for 20 years – when I first started to do this – was that is very hard for that 5-10% of the population who have the education, the resources, and the capacity to act with real power, particularly when they organize. They just couldn't fathom that the agenda – which I describe as 'Mr. Global', which is the committee that runs the world – of Mr. Global was clearly and intentionally anti-human.

What I'm starting to see, during the last six months to a year, is it is dawning on them that it is insane. What I'm hoping is, that as people start to understand, "That's nuts," now they're going to try to stop it. "What do we do?"

Your description of Italy sounds like that 5% is coming together and saying, "Okay."

Scott Tips: They really are.

C. Austin Fitts: What are your thoughts on how that 5% starts to get traction on health freedom?

Scott Tips: Well, we probably will launch a number of lawsuits – some international, and some against the actors personally – because we found that if some bureaucrat or official's personal assets are on the line, they are less apt to take actions against you.

In the US you have Title 42 and you can use that against anyone who deprives you of your civil rights. You can go for their bank account, their car, their house – everything. You bring it to Federal court, which is their territory, unless it is a state official and you can use that.

We are looking into that fervidly. We are also looking into the International Tribunal on Human Rights to bring an action to force Italy because essentially this decree, which the President of Italy still hasn't signed into law, – he should have done it yesterday or the day before, but he still hasn't done it as of now – violates at least six or seven international laws. It violates the right to basic informed consent.

If someone is forced to get a vaccine, then they haven't given their consent. It violates that, and certainly the informed consent. It also violates about three or four articles in the Italian constitution. So there are all sorts of good grounds to win this and I'm actually quite hopeful that we can win it. The reason to win in Italy is, not only to help Italian children, but also it's the camel's nose in the tent for what is happening elsewhere in Europe and around the world. If we stop it here and we show enough concerted effort in Italy, then they may think twice before they bring it into other countries.

That is why we are doing it, and the game plan is mainly legal action and equitable action against these mal players

C. Austin Fitts: Before we end, I want to touch on another article in this month's news, which is Bill Sardi's article on fake news. The fake news on supplements is mind-boggling and maybe you could speak on that.

Part of turning this around is dealing with the fake news and the fake science which unfortunately dovetail and feed each other.

Scott Tips: Yes. They usually have it as a one-two punch. They will launch the propaganda campaign first and then tag-team it with the legislative action that has prepared the bill – miraculously – which is anywhere from 150 pages to 1,000 pages. It's all prepared and ready to be introduced and passed, even without reading. Of course, we all know from the news how 'bad' supplements are.

Dietary supplements are safer than tap water, aspirin, table salt, and even food. The poison control centers have even issued statistics that show how incredibly safe supplements are, yet everywhere you read and you hear about how they are unregulated, how they are dangerous, and yet you are more likely to die from a bee sting or a lightning strike or falling off a horse than you are from taking a supplement.

It is that safe of a product, yet this is where the government wants to spend billions and billions of your tax dollars and our dollars to make these products ‘safer’ when they should be focusing on the very dangerous products – if they are going to focus on anything – and that is the drugs and the vaccines that are incredibly unsafe, and yet are touted as being ‘safe products’ when they absolutely are not.

C. Austin Fitts: I think that the most dangerous product is fake news and mind control. That is what is getting everybody to agree with spending a fortune on things that are hurting them.

Scott Tips: It is. On top of that, it persuades people to forego taking things that are good for them too. It not only pulls them into the direction of bad products, but it pulls them away from good products that could really help them live a healthier and higher quality life – even to the very end.

C. Austin Fitts: Right. It’s frightening because I deal much with financial fraud, and you see people burnt by financial fraud again and again and again.

I was recently in California driving around Marin County and San Francisco, and everybody is banking at the same banks that just finished defrauding millions of Americans. You think, “How can you possibly feel that you’re safe in this bank?”

I don’t get it. It’s almost like a codependency. I think much of it comes from the fake news and the mind control.

C. Austin Fitts: Yes. Tell us what is next for Scott Tips and NHF.

Scott Tips: Through all this exposure that we’ve had of late, we’re increasing our membership. We will venture back into the Italian anti-vaccine campaign that has recently erupted. We plan to have bigger exposure on the internet. Our website was finally recreated after it had been hacked a couple of years ago and still was damaged. Someone deleted our directory, deleted all of our articles, and deleted our blog site. I guess we were too much of a threat.

In any event, our goal is to both increase income and membership so that we can participate in more of these Codex meetings and have more of an impact there, and at the same time have an impact on the vaccine issues, return to Washington, deal with some of the issues that are coming up and may come up there. We need to make sure that supplements are not attacked any further than they have been.

Many times, as of late, it's been FTC actions or it's been the FDA taking actions against individual supplement companies, which then cuts off our supply to our consumer members for the products that they know and trust and that they like and want to buy.

It's generally that and generating the public as well.

C. Austin Fitts: Has there been any legal efforts in any of these forums to address mind control and what is being done to the population using entrainment technology?

Scott Tips: Not in legal forums, but educationally, yes.

Like you, I've written about the Wikipedia's manufactured consent. I've written on other things about other articles and about the fake news that has been out there when I give speeches.

I give a great deal of speeches, and we have a couple of events coming up that will take place in the UK in September – next month. We really beat on that drum a lot to get people aware that they're being propagandized and that they need to be aware that this is fake news.

Even with some people who think that Fox News is so great- I just saw a piece on Fox News and I don't normally watch Fox News- but I happened to see a bit yesterday. There was a big propaganda piece about all the immigrants coming in and how much they contribute to society in Italy. I was very surprised to see that on Fox News, but there it was.

One thing that we have to do is to distrust and guard against the capture of even trusted news sites to see them turn.

Even on the Drudge Report, it's making me a little curious about it. More and more they are showing links there, and you click on the link to read the full article. They only have a little segment with the title there, and then they take us to trash news sites rather than good news sites. They are taking us to the Washington Post or the New York Times or the L.A. 'Slime' or something like that. They aren't taking us to any news that we can trust. So why is Drudge doing that?

I think that all of us have to guard against the websites or the news sources that we've trusted in the past. We have to be careful that they aren't captured and converted.

C. Austin Fitts: It's interesting. It happens very rarely, but sometimes I will link to the Post or the Times. Occasionally you will get a good article. They have amazing resources, and so occasionally I will see an article that I think is credible or I think is a good example of the fake news happening around what is usually a political issue.

Scott Tips: I admit that. There are some good ones in the Washington Post even though it's nothing but a CIA mouthpiece. But the ones I'm talking about are the ones where they give this fake news point of view; it's not even something neutral. I think: Why am I reading what Nancy Pelosi believes is the reason for something? I could read that by being on the DNC email list – which I am.

C. Austin Fitts: The simplest way to save time and money is to turn all that off and ignore it completely.

Scott Tips: Speaking of which, I tried to unsubscribe from the DNC email list, and it's impossible. They don't allow me to unsubscribe, so don't get on the Democratic National Committee email list.

C. Austin Fitts: They probably think that you're a Russian.

Scott Tips: They probably do. If you get on their list, you will never be removed. Believe me, I've tried – short of suing them, which may be the next and final step. I could file a class action lawsuit against them because it's actually illegal what they're doing. But then again, when did legality ever stop them?

You are absolutely right about the fake news and how to stop that. If we can stop that, it will help address many of our problems.

C. Austin Fitts: You stop it very easily. If the 5% that we're discussing simply deletes them and say, "You know something? We don't care what you say. We're not going to listen, we're not going to subscribe, we're not going to read," shunning is the most powerful political tool in the world, particularly if you are shunning with your consumer or investment dollars.

Scott Tips: That is what I do and to Wikipedia and to the Washington Post and the others. You're right. We need a critical mass to do that, and then we'll be ahead of the game.

C. Austin Fitts: I can't talk about Wikipedia because I continue to use it, but that is a conversation for another day.

I want to tell you that you are living proof of what amazing things can be accomplished if you refuse to give up. I really think that if you look at all the people now realizing how anti-human the agenda is and the extent to which we have all sorts of documentary makers and other efforts swarming in, something is starting to gather. Of course, it has to be global.

One of the great powers of NHF is that you have a real global presence. I think that now is the time to make a really major turn here. If we let this happen and we let them go to anti-human, we are talking about losing everything.

Scott Tips: Yes we are, we really are and that is the bottom line. Thank you for that.

C. Austin Fitts: Tell us how people can find your website and sign up to be an NHF member and receive Health Freedom News.

Scott Tips: It's super-easy, and it's something that everyone should do because it's something that pays dividends down the line. It's similar to making an investment or paying an insurance policy that you need at some point.

Go to our website at www.TheNHF.com, and click on 'Sign up for the free e-list' and that is how you learn about what we do. We don't spam you and you probably won't even get but one email a month, if that.

At the same time, join and when you become a member, you get the magazine. That is what you were talking about in the beginning and I'm glad that you like the magazine. A fabulous graphic designer named Ben does it.

C. Austin Fitts: He does our Wrap Ups.

Scott Tips: Yes. The other thing is that, quite honestly, if you don't want to join – although I can't imagine why not – at least donate. Donate to us because that is what keeps us in the field protecting people's health and that is actually it. We don't get big bucks from corporations or money from the government or special grants or things like that. We depend on your listeners and people like your listeners to give anything from $3 (and we've literally had three $1 bills emptied out of an envelope from an elderly woman's last money from her social security check) to people sending us checks or calling the office and giving credit card information.

We really need people's support because that is what keeps us going. Quite honestly, right now with all these meetings and things that we've done, we've drained the kitty. Now we need some people to step up and really support us to keep going and keep growing. It's very important.

It's important insurance, and it's important dues to pay to stop this juggernaut. As you so well put it, it's an anti-human juggernaut.

C. Austin Fitts: If you knew how much everybody listening into this call is putting into the anti-human pocket, it's a large amount. We need to rebalance our own budgets first.

Scott, have a wonderful evening and thank you so much for joining us. I'm sending so many prayers for all your efforts in Codex and all these other efforts.

Scott Tips: We could use them.

C. Austin Fitts: I think that health freedom is number one.

Scott Tips: It truly is, and I so appreciate your support, Catherine, not only now but over the years, so many, many thanks. That is one reason we wanted to feature you on the cover of our magazine.

C. Austin Fitts: Oh, that's right! You did.

Scott Tips: You looked good.

C. Austin Fitts: I really appreciate that.

Scott Tips: Thank you. It brought a lot of positive feedback as well.

C. Austin Fitts: Good. Well, thank you, Scott. You have a great day.
